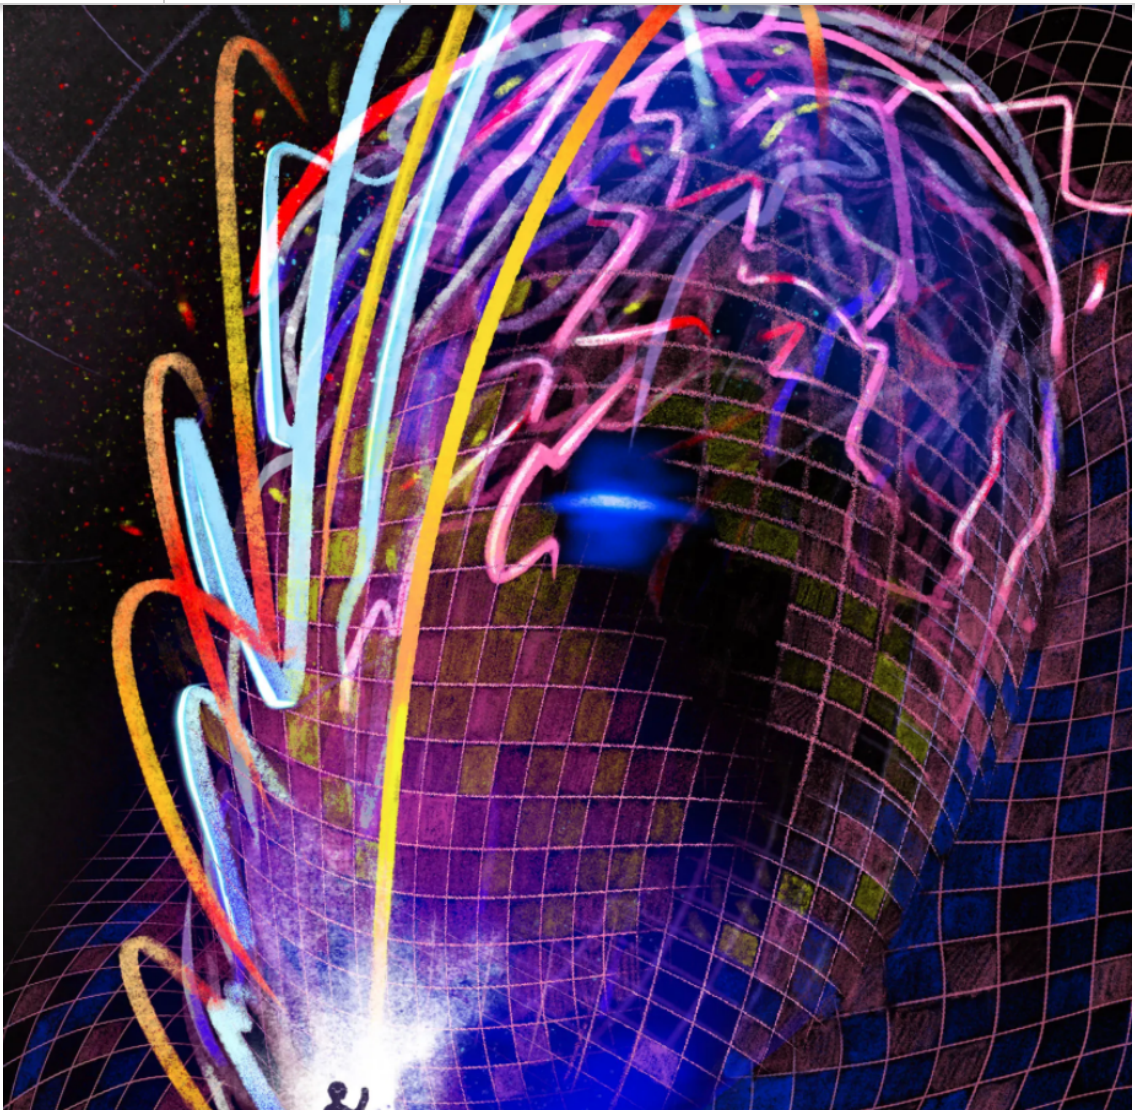
Lemons, Anyone?

Thanks to the generosity and good care of Jim Meyer and Ann Heurlin's lemon tree, they are once again offering lemons from their harvest. Special thanks to our volunteers, Aldo and Raine, who climbed the ladder and helped with the harvesting and to those available to deliver them to your door!

Lemons will be delivered on Tuesday (2/23) to your door.

Open to Sausalito Village Members and Volunteers. First come first served.



Who Should Stop Unethical A.I.?

At artificial-intelligence conferences, researchers are increasingly alarmed by what they see.

reasons

We look to history to help us understand who we are today. Yet history is also an imperfect, often inadequate record of events. Depending on who is depicting the past, certain truths go untold. That is indeed the lesson of 1619, a year that few people understood as significant in American and African-American history until nearly two years ago.

5 Wildflower Hikes to Try in Marin this February

Even though the winter of 2020 was a washout in many ways, in terms of rainfall things were pretty dry. Thanks to an atmospheric river in January and some other later rains however, the wildflower prospect is looking bright. So strap on your mask and hiking books and take in the kaleidoscopic beauty of Marin's hillsides in all corners of the county. Whether you're seeking a butt-burning climb or a family-friendly stroll, here are a handful to get you started. Detailed maps of hikes like these and more can be found online via One Tam and AllTrails, among others.

How To Retain Your Heat (And Stay Upbeat) With Friends Outside This Winter

"I live by myself, so I'm constantly thinking about how to meet up with my friends and family without putting them or myself in danger," says Linda Poon, a journalist in Washington, D.C. "And I'm someone who hates the cold."

Poon, a reporter for CityLab who recently wrote "How to Socialize in the Cold Without Being Miserable," and a few outdoor enthusiasts share their advice.
