Lines in the Sand: Artist Jim Denevan Turns Beaches into Temporary Geometric Artworks

For well over a decade California artist Jim Denevan (previously) has made his mark in the sand, etching elaborate geometric artworks on beaches around the world using little more than a rake or found stick. The pieces last only a few hours, or begin disappearing even as he works, as the tides quickly erase each design leaving only a memory or a photograph. Great Big Story recently visited Denevan and shot this brief profile of the artist as he created a number of pieces.

demonstrations, and uncover fascinating connections between individual elements and our collective human experience.

In this new Everything Matters segment, get to know the colorful element cadmium. Once used in rechargeable batteries, TV picture tubes, and artists' pigments (its use has been curtailed due to its toxic nature, though you can still find cadmium red and yellow paint if you look), its light once served as the standard for measuring certain lengths. Today, you'll find it in photocells, quantum dots for LCD televisions, control rods in nuclear reactors, and solar cells.
