need to determine what constitutes a building – when is a ruin too far gone to count? Could an inhabited dwelling within the natural landscape, say a cave, make the cut? Next, the degree of authenticity needs to be considered. If a building has been taken apart and put back together again, would that lead to its disqualification in your book? Similarly, if a newer structure has been erected on older foundations, which part is relevant? Would an older annex on the grounds of another building merit the accolade in its own right? Complicating things further, written records can be sketchy and improvements to dating technology can alter the pecking order.
