We're inviting everyone to think back over the past year and try to capture it in six words! We'll share our creations at the party!

Hemingway is said to have been challenged to write a 6-word story. So we wrote "For sale baby shoes, never worn." Some years ago a fun website was created 6 Word Memoirs.

Will You See The 'Christmas Star' On The Solstice? Why 2020's Longest Night Of The Year Is Unique

Winter is coming.

Astronomically speaking, this week heralds the end of fall and the beginning of winter in the northern hemisphere. Though meteorologists like to define the seasons differently—with winter beginning on December 1 each year—astronomers say that winter begins on the date of the solstice.

This year that's Monday, December 21, 2020 at 10:03 Universal Time.

The big questions of philosophy, simmering since antiquity, still press upon us as they did the Athenians of old (and all ancient people who have philosophized): what obligations do we really owe to family, friends, or strangers? Do we live as free agents or beings controlled by fate or the gods (or genes or a computer simulation)? What is a good life? How do we create societies that maximize freedom and happiness (or whatever ultimate values we hold dear)? What is language, what is art, and where did they come from?

Know It

If you've seen any Hollywood movie set in ancient Egypt, you already know how its language sounded: just like English, but spoken with a more formal diction and a range of broadly Middle-Eastern accents. But then there are many competing theories about life that long ago, and perhaps you'd prefer to believe the linguistic-historical take provided in the video above. A production of Joshua Rudder's NativLang, a Youtube channel previously featured here on Open Culture for its videos on ancient Latin and Chinese, it tells the story of "the many forms of the long-lived Egyptian languages," as well as its "ancestors and relatives," and how they've helped linguists determine just how the ancient Egyptians really spoke.
